Ken MacIntosh welcomed everyone to this meeting of the Cross Party Group on Asthma to celebrate the launch of the Asthma UK Centre for Applied Research.

Kay Boycott spoke as CEO of Asthma UK to welcome the work of the centre, emphasise why asthma research is so important. 17 years that it currently takes asthma research to reach patients is too long, the centre aims to half that time and get life saving treatments to patients quicker.

Chris Griffiths, lead researcher for the centre said that it represents a step change in asthma research. With links throughout the UK this centre provides a model for international research in the future.

Elisabeth Ehrlich gave the patient perspective about why research is so important to people with asthma, that without research we wouldn't have many of the life saving treatments that we have today, but we need more.

Denis Robertson asked about young people and whether young people are still growing out of asthma.

Kay Boycott and Chris Griffiths replied that young people and research are very important that we have to get the balance right between asthma being a serious condition and one that is controllable, haven't got that right yet.

How will the centre impact in 10-15 years. Believe that it will impact on the organisation of care, that sharing of information across boundaries will be key and that walls between services will be broken down.

We will learn more about asthma and ensure that new treatments are cost effective.

Ken MacIntosh closed the meeting by thanking those involved and welcoming the centre and all it hopes to achieve.
